Great. Well, we're thrilled today to have the management of Celsius. Celsius, it's no exaggeration to say, has been one of the, if not the most exciting dynamic growth stories, not just all of beverages, but all of staples over the last couple of years, and continues to have phenomenal prospects. Coming from Celsius, we have John Fieldly, CEO, and with him, Toby David, who John describes as his right-hand man from day one. Really excited. Let's get started. If we look back three or four years ago, there's some case to be made that you were still a little bit operating slightly below the radar screen. For many people, call it four or five years ago.

Bang Energy came in and banged down the door for what we and others talk about a new wave of energy drinks. Lots of different names, whether you call it clean or functional or any other adjective. And I think it really demonstrated that there was a consumer need that the legacy drinks did not serve. I think that's very clear. We now have a second wave of drinks led by Celsius, and includes a lot of smaller companies with anywhere from a half to two points or so of market share.

Just starting off for those who may not be as familiar with the story as your long-term investors, does that characterization make sense to you? When you look at your brand versus the other new wave brands, whether it's a C4, a Ghost, ZOA, A-Shock, Alani Nu, and there's a bunch of them. What do you think distinguishes Celsius from the rest of the pack in terms of branding, the product, the liquid?

Questions And Answers

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes. I think it's a great intro in regards to where the brand has been, and we can talk about some of the competition today. For some of the investors out there, potential investors that don't know the story, and the brand's been around for over a decade. I've been here 12 years, Toby's been here for 11. The evolution of the brand, and most importantly, the evolution of consumers have changed as well. You go back five years where we were working at Celsius in that state. We were not really allowed to play in traditional convenience.

The buyers really saw Celsius as a fitness brand that belonged in the fitness space, belonged in vitamin shop, GNC, HBC sets, and grocery in large format. So. Really didn't belong in that traditional energy space. Can't tell you time and time again, we heard that story. That's how we built the brand outside of traditional energy. We built it in grocery, mass drug, and really also most recently over the last several years, club has been great for us.

The last frontier is really for Celsius, the big opportunity is convenience. That's where we're at today. You're right, bang did bang down the door for opening the eyes of this fitness movement. These fitness brands are really hitting a mainstream consumer. And you look at the trends as well when you look at fitness and fitness lifestyle. You go back five, 10 years ago, you look at the growth in a number of gyms. A lot of gyms now, they're in the entertainment business as well.

We speak with a lot of owners. So, really that whole transformation has taken place with fitness being more lifestyle, even the clothing apparel industry. All industries have been affected by this movement. That has really allowed other brands that you mentioned, and earlier brands you mentioned wanted to share to come in today. I don't know if you want to hit on some of the current environment.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Yes, a lot of new players to the category. Every year there's new players. You've got Ghost, you've got Alani Nu, you've got C4, you have Bucked Up Goat. I mean, you could go through all laundry list and let's say a lot of nice brands out there and it's a lot of competition every day. So especially where we're situated, we're number three energy brand in the country, strong number three, we're building a delta between us and number four and number five. We're inching closer to one and two, so there's a long way to go before you get to number one and number two. So, you got your eyes situated ahead of you at Red Bull and Monster, but you also have to be understanding of who's coming up behind you as well. So, it's really interesting position for us today.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

And I think, Robert, you mentioned some of those other brands, what makes Celsius unique compared to some of them. Each brand, as Domi [ph] mentioned, there's great brands out there and each have their own attributes that are trying to connect with consumers and really build a community around that. And I think what we've done here with Celsius, which I think is really sets us apart, is the community we've built around the brand as a daily lifestyle.

We're a fitness lifestyle brand born and rooted in fitness, but positioned for the really mass appeal in that broad consumer today. And you look at three of the fastest growing trends in food and beverage. You look at everyone wants better for you, but they don't want to sacrifice flavor. We have several essential vitamins, green tea, ginger, guarana, biotin, vitamin C. Well, we don't sacrifice that flavor. We also have no aspartame, no high glucose corn syrup.

So, we have those attributes. Number two, we all want more function in the foods we consume. And you look at what we have with Celsius, we're more than an energy drink. We have those clinical studies. We have that additional functionality of a thermogenic with fat burning and calorie burning capabilities to help you achieve your health and wellness goals.

So, we offer that functionality need state. And then number three, with that fitness lifestyle, really being on a premium angle, premium, premiumly accepted with consumers today. It's massively on trend. We really fit that need state well on a broader national scale. And I think that's why you're seeing us gain additional broad consumers and really contributing to the category growth as we're bringing new consumers in.

A - Unidentified Speaker

John, those comments actually remind me of a conversation that you and I had. I don't know if it was three years ago, four years ago. It was at NACS [ph]. Coca-Cola had just come out with Coke

Bloomberg

Energy. And I was asking you if you were worried about that. And you had this great response. It was like, hell no, Robert. You said this is the best thing that could happen because this is normalizing the energy drink category, making it more mainstream, and away from being a nichier type category.

This is actually really good for us.

And I think, what you just said to me resonates with that a little bit. I think that was pressing. Any further thoughts and learnings from, it's amazing, I mean, Coke Energy didn't really work. The Mountain Dew Energy is stumbling. Any thoughts in terms of learnings of what may have gone wrong with the big guys and why they're not taking off? And then this whole idea of mainstreaming the category that you're starting to play into.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think I remember those conversations at NACS. And I think it's great, right? Let's bring more CSD consumers into exploring this energy category. And I think that's what differentiates us. we're more inviting. You look at our flavors that we have. We have great core flavors. Just launched a lemon lime flavor this year. Really great, did a lead launch of Walmart. Stuff worked out really well. we're accepting. We also look at some of our vibe flavors, really fun and exciting. We do experiential marketing around that.

So, with these other CSD brands, really pulling consumers out of CSD and maybe allowing them to experience the energy category, that allows us to really play in that space because, we're not aggressive. You look at a packaging, some of those things, not very intense and we got great flavors and you get a great experience once we launch.

You get a great experience once we know, when a consumer tries, we got a really high take weight and build that loyalty. The other thing I think which gets us excited, especially after the Pepsi partnership, and Toby and I talk about this, which is a surprise, is 10% of our sales at the end of the first quarter came from food service within Pepsi. So, that's a huge unlock, showing that Celsius, potentially, is broader than energy. And I think that's what, what we're looking at.

We go back when we talked about three years ago at NACS, we're really trying to go after that energy category as a really great opportunity to play in energy, we had the capabilities of, based on the functionality, what we're hearing from consumers. But now we're saying, well, maybe the usage occasion is even broader than that.

What we're seeing with Pepsi, looking at food service opportunities with pairing with food and lunch and some of the consumption around, especially just around the office, when friends and family that we know, we know consumers are drinking and consuming product with lunch. So, we think there's a huge unlock there. We got a lot of more data points we got to capture on this, especially with this, like Grubhub and delivery dudes, a lot of consumers when they purchasing really a lunch or a food item, they're not buying a fountain drink.

So, there could be a huge opportunity to unlock that. We could show that Celsius is added as a basket ring and so on. So those are things we're working on, but just on the initial feedback on Pepsi, and it's really only three months that we really are really in food service there. So, excited about that as energy being broader than just energy.

A - Unidentified Speaker

That's very exciting and something I had no idea about. So that's, I appreciate that. John, let's talk a little bit about demographics. the traditional energy drinks that are a very specific demographic, very male, a little bit more blue collar. In terms of Celsius, what's your, roughly speaking, maybe gender breakout, income, any other key demographic tells that you think are important, and have they stayed relatively constant over the last five years, or are you, or is your growth actually coming from bringing in new demographics?

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I'll start it off like history, and I'll let Toby give a state of the union in regards to what we're seeing now. If you go back that five-year period, because of the way the brand went and really went through the fitness channel historically, we've been a large, really an older demographic, really like 25 to like 40 has been like the target. It was our target average consumer. We've always been about 50-50 male, female.

Prior back then, we were a little bit more on the female side on the overall mix, and the income, our income demographics were fairly higher, but keep in mind, the bulk of our sales were coming from vitamin specialty and gyms, and on Amazon as well, so, and in the HBC sets within grocery. So, it was a higher income consumer, 50-50, like somewhat mix of male, female, a little bit more leaning towards the female consumer back then, but today that's changed.

A - Toby David {BIO 20749891 <GO>}

Yes, I think today when you look at the overall demo, still close to a 50-50, but we're starting to incrementally go up a little bit more towards males, that could be because of the acceleration and the convenience channel for us, and obviously that's the demo that typically shops within convenience. What we're also seeing is we over-index with Hispanic, over-index with African-American.

What's also critical for Celsius is 24% of our consumers are new to category, that's per numerator. Numerator also says an additional 44%, they term user intensification, which means they're actually consuming more Celsius or more energy drinks than they otherwise would have because they're consuming Celsius. So, for retailers, 68% of our consumption with that 24% and that 44%, 68% is incremental to the category.

So, when you're looking at the trends, you're looking new consumers to the category, over-indexing Hispanic and African-American, over-indexing with females, it's really, we're hitting that sweet spot right now for retailers because we're bringing those new consumers to the category, not just brand shifting.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Yes, those comments in terms of the Hispanic, African-American, that also was very new to me. Is that a function of specific targeting? Is it a function of maybe the states where you're really strong, like a California, Florida, or do you think that it's a sense that the other energy drinks were more targeted to different demographics and therefore, there's a different factor at play here? I'm just curious of how you're thinking about that.

A - Toby David {BIO 20749891 <GO>}

Yes, I think when you look at the packaging, it's so welcoming to everyone. It's a clean packaging. People are looking for something that's a little easier to consume, that's more fruit forward, not as heavy on the sugar. So, I think you get people, whether they're Hispanic, African-American, female, or just male in general, they're looking for that better for you. They don't want to sacrifice taste, but they don't want something that can overwhelm a sugar rush or crash.

© COPYRIGHT 2024, BLOOMBERG LP. All rights reserved. Any reproduction, redistribution or retransmission is expressly prohibited.

Everybody wants that. Everybody's looking to drink something that's a little bit better for them and also that's functional. So, I think that's really what we're seeing. There might be a little bit in terms of geography. We are strong in Southern California, Dallas, South Florida, so especially from a Hispanic angle, we've never really done ethno-marketing before. So, there's an opportunity for us to get a wide swath of people across all demographics.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think that goes back to what we talked about four or three of the fastest growing trends in food and beverage, and those trends are universal and they're not just in the US, they're global. And those continue to gain, especially coming out of a post-pandemic world where everyone's paying more attention to what you're putting in your body. Exercise is extremely important in today's diet and lifestyle, and the brand hits on that.

And we're not overly aggressive like some of the other brands. I think, and some of the brands, because of the ingredients, they still have very high-performance ingredients in them, which Celsius, we hear hand over and over again that you get no crash and no jitters, get a great experience with the product. And to go back to what we always talk about, the products taste great.

A - Unidentified Speaker

I'm having the sparkling frozen berry, it's fabulous.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

It takes you into a mystical frozen land. So, you're getting a nice experience today too.

Good choice. Good choice.

It's awesome. So, look, I want to talk a little bit about pricing and promo, which is always a sensitive topic. It's an important one. And there's some tricky dynamics here. So, and I'm sensitive that this is a sensitive topic and some of the stuff here is tricky to talk about. So, if you look at the energy drink sector, less pricing than CSDs, Red Bull had, should have taken a leadership.

It dragged its feet for a while. It and Monster finally took some pricing in the fall of last year, which looks like it's largely stuck and people have followed. But what we're starting to pick up on a little bit is a little bit increased promo now. Now that could just be a return to normal, right? Because during COVID, the job is get the product on the shelf.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Right.

A - Unidentified Speaker

And there's no point in promoting if the product's not on the shelf. And a lot of, not so much you, but a lot of your competitors did have promo. They didn't have problems getting product on the shelf. The other thing that we're hearing a little bit about, and it's going to good news, bad news, in the sense that, and again, I'm just mentioning what I'm hearing, that you guys have really been taking some significant share from Red Bull and Red Bull doesn't like to lose market share. And they are starting to hit the promo button a little bit. So, love to get your thoughts on this topic.

And to the extent you're comfortable, again, I know this is stuff that is very competitively sensitive, its tricky stuff, but how do you, I mean, look, you're 8% market share, looking like you're going to go to 10. A lot of it is new, unquestionably, a lot of it is new, but you're causing the big people a little bit of pain and they can react in different ways. So, and one of those ways is promo. How should we think about, how are you thinking about that dynamic now where there could be more promo?

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think, obviously, I think you're right. I think if you look at last year compared to this year, especially during summer, there's a lot more promos maybe this year versus last year. Historically, the category is always 24 to 28 weeks of promo a year. So, it's a highly promoted category when you look at the variety of different channels and promotional strategies within each channel.

So, we're going to have promotions, we're going to run deals. Retailers are asking for that now as well. I think prior to that, they want to increase traffic, foot traffic in stores, so they want to offer something unique as well. So, we're seeing pricing, we'll see how Red Bull, Red Monster reacts. It is highly competitive. They're two great brands. There's a lot of room in the category for us, for us all. And we're watching the pricing and we'll see where we go.

There's plenty of pricing for all of us in the category. And the category, the doors keep getting bigger as well. You're seeing a lot more retailers allocate more space to energy. So that's a good thing, overall, for the category. In addition, the category has grown to 10 to 15% or anticipated to, so good category growth. So, there's a variety of room for a couple of great brands to be large players. And we think we fit nicely within that overarching category there with the rest of the major players.

I would say, Red Bull took some pretty strong promotional activity back in January and February, very strong, primarily in grocery, but also in convenience. It's really evened out more to more, maybe some of their traditional, where they've been historically in the last couple of months. But to John's point, it's a street war out there.

I mean, I think that's really the other piece, other elements, not just promotional, but it's a fight for space. And when you're a one or 2% brand, you're that proverbial fly on the horses, you know what, and they're not really too worried about you. Whereas, when you're getting close to that 10%, you're pulling some share from them, it becomes a little bit more problematic, maybe for the two big players. So, it's a street war out there.

I would say this, we are as well situated now as we've ever been before on how to defend that and be proactive. We've got an amazing team internally and to have a partner like Pepsi, you can go out and execute in the field nationally instead of having to work with 300 great distributors that we had previously, they're fantastic. But when it's a fragmented network, it's sometimes difficult to have all working at the same time cohesively. So, to have a partner like Pepsi go out there and fight in that street fight with us, we feel pretty confident right now.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

© COPYRIGHT 2024, BLOOMBERG LP. All rights reserved. Any reproduction, redistribution or retransmission is expressly prohibited.

And you talk about an eight share nationally, I mean, we mentioned on the last earnings call, I mean, in South Florida, we're at 22 shares. So, I mean, highly competitive in the category where we're at. I mean, its Toby's point, it is a street war every day. It's highly aggressive. We wouldn't be able to compete at this level without Pepsi, right?

So, I think that gives us, to Toby's point, gives us at least an even playing field to compete in this rapidly growing category at the highest level, which gets us excited, especially coming up with our one-year anniversary with Pepsi distribution partnership here in October. So, I think it's gone really well and we're able to compete and it shows that we can compete.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Yes, and you actually moved right into my question. Next question was, and you touched on it, I don't know if you can elaborate on it at all, but it is a street war, right? I mean, it is a hand-to-hand combat, a count after count. It's really rough and tumble. Lots of stuff goes back and forth. Do you feel that being aligned with Pepsi gives you an advantage that you didn't have? Do you feel that the big guys are going to think twice about how they compete against you, tactically speaking, given that you're aligned with Pepsi as opposed to being a small independent?

Because there's a lot of games that people play and there's the big kid in the schoolyard and the little kid and the little kid likes to have alliances and sometimes that helps a lot. So, just trying to get a sense of how being hooked up with Pepsi benefits as you really have become very high on the radar screen, not just of consumers, but also of the bigger players.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think, well, the main item that gives us a competitive advantage, it's always going to be, especially in the energy category, but just in business in general, I mean, it's always competitive, right? No matter what category you're in, no matter what business you're in, you're always competing against, especially the two of the largest players within your space or sector.

So, it's always going to be a competition and that's never going to end, but what Pepsi allows us to do is, versus the prior network we were in, which was fragmented, we had to work with like over 300 different independent distributors, you couldn't get a national program executed effectively with a national retailer. So, it was very much more regional execution. So, you couldn't compete at that national level.

So, I think what Pepsi allows us to do is allows us to compete on a national level with national execution and national consistency, which I think is extremely important as well when you're competing at this level versus prior, we could do, we wouldn't get, even though we had the national retailer, we couldn't get it really a national execution cohesively completed to drive total store. If you're talking about 7-Eleven, you're talking about some of these CVS or some of these national players, to get national execution is extremely difficult. So, I think that allows us to play on the national field.

A - Unidentified Speaker

And then of course you also have, you still have Big Geyser, right?

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, Big Geyser is great, doing a great job for us in New York, talking with Jerry Rita this morning, super excited about where the brand is, the opportunity that lays ahead and additional cold and cooler replacements. And he's done a great job with the brand and it feels like it's just getting started up there. So, really excited.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Yes, no, no, he's phenomenal. And we see just terrific execution in New York and Long Island. So, absolutely. So, the two big competitors out there have really, really different brands and really different brand strategies, right? They couldn't be more different. One is very focused, a relatively limited number of SKUs, one or two innovations a year. The other big competitor is like, just trying to grab as much shelf space and doors with different innovations into adjacencies as possible.

Where do you see your strategy developing? So far, you've had some great innovation. A lot of it is flavor and attitudinal in a sense. Is -- Are you going to stick with that or are you hinted maybe doing some other stuff? And earlier on when we started the conversation, you did start talking about different occasions like the food occasion, which may lead to perhaps a different liquid, I don't know. So, maybe if you can talk about how, you see the brand going over the next three to four, five years.

Yes, I mean, I think there's opportunities. we're working on a three-to-five-year strategy, refining it again, always reevaluating our strategies as we each year and each quarter. But I think there's opportunities to go into other adjacent categories and opportunities. I think now that we have the partnership with Pepsi, it's almost looking at white space within their portfolio and how we can bring innovative offerings.

So, changes the strategy a little bit from the prior three to five-year strategy when we look at it. But I will tell you right now, we're extremely focused on our core portfolio. The runway that is ahead of us on our core portfolio is really exciting. I think it's timing and sequencing and most importantly, discipline. So, that's our primary focus right now. I think there's a long runway ahead. To your mention, there's a lot of, we got to get additional placements at store.

We're about 13.6 placements or items per store right now. Huge opportunity for further innovation, pack size innovation. And of course, with our flavors, we're seeing great opportunities with our variety packs and large format. Great flavor innovation, like our Green Apple Cherry at 7-Eleven or Oasis Five we just launched. We got some great new flavors in the pipeline for 24.

So, I think there's a lot we can do in this portfolio. Although, also our powder business has been great as well. So, I think there's a big opportunity there. So, as we look ahead, there's a lot of focus and a lot of work to be done on our core portfolio before we start going into adjacent categories. But it's stuff we're looking at, but I think it's the right time, the right sequencing for that.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Great. So, one of the things that blew me away like three years ago or so was the learning, the amazing presence you have at Amazon and e-commerce. So, I'd love to understand, is this --- is the incrementality of that and how it helps you competitively, right? So, is this the same consumer, a different consumer? If it's a different consumer, how is it a different consumer?

Is it different demographic? Are the margins incremental or dilutive? And then when you go into your conversations with other channels, is your strong presence in Amazon a positive one? Is your strong presence in Amazon a positive or is it a negative and a challenge that you have to overcome? So, love to understand that whole area of your business and how it impacts on the rest.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, don't get me started.

A - Toby David {BIO 20749891 <GO>}

Yes, I mean, we have, as of Q1, our Q1 earnings, we said the 19% market share that we have on Amazon, which is really incredible. We're about, I think, six or seven points ahead of Red Bull. So, the second largest energy brand on Amazon, just a couple of points behind Monster for number one. We've been a strong suit of ours for a while. And I think if you had asked us three or four years ago, to your point, Robert, why are you so strong on Amazon?

Maybe one of the theses would have been, oh, well, it's because you don't have national distribution yet. It was acting as essentially our national distribution point because maybe we weren't in a lot of other regions of the country. But as we built out this DSD network for the last, I mean, since 2020 now, we've continued to pick up additional share on Amazon. And not only that, but you see the emergence of the club channel for us, COSTCO in particular, we did almost $50 million in Q1 in club.

So, a $200 million run rate, you're not losing market share on Amazon. So, not only are you not losing market share on Amazon, it's increasing. Meanwhile, you're growing, with the latest Nielsen data, 140% in the last two-week poll yesterday. I mean, you're not seeing any cannibalization. That's what's so remarkable about this. And who's the consumer? Everybody, everybody purchases on Amazon. I mean, I don't know anybody who doesn't use Amazon at this point.

So, really, I think if you actually were to ask Amazon, so I remember I spoke to them years ago, they loved hearing about additional distribution points and picking up new convenience and new grocery around the country, because that was just more brand awareness that, as you got into 7-Eleven and Circle K and people were buying their, their impulse purchases, especially at convenience, they're going to go back home and they're going to stock up and buy a 12-pack at Celsius for some other day part, some other usage occasion.

So, it's been really remarkable to see the growth that we've had on Amazon and continue to do so. We're seeing, Instacart, we're seeing a lot of success with. Owning the phone is really an important part of our business here, and whether that's from a marketing perspective, a sales perspective, but Amazon's going to continue to be an important vehicle for us.

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think, Robert, the other piece is we've always embraced an omni-channel world. So, consumers want it when they want it, how they want it. So, it's, and that's a big key component. Well, I will tell you that, has it been contentious with some retailers as we've scaled and gone through? Sure, absolutely, right?

And we've had a lot of difficulty with, some of our key accounts team members along the journey, and, as we're scaling and different variety of things, but, we've worked through those challenges and really, as Toby mentioned, really talked about the importance of Amazon is really helping, it's a multifaceted approach. It's helping, it's a different potential consumer, it's a different shopping occasion, potentially different usage occasion. It's showing that loyalty.

© COPYRIGHT 2024, BLOOMBERG LP. All rights reserved. Any reproduction, redistribution or retransmission is expressly prohibited.

Bloomberg

I think that what surprised us, as Toby mentioned, is just, it's like all tides are rising. And, I wish for sure that the club business as well, the expansion, the explosiveness we've had in the club channel, I was for sure that would help, that we would see some type of impact at grocery or mass or Amazon, just because of the availability, but we're not. So, it's quite astonishing.

A - Unidentified Speaker

And is the growth rate on Amazon faster or slower than let's say what we see in Scanner?

A - Toby David {BIO 20749891 <GO>}

I think it's been strong, very strong, but maybe not quite as strong as, some of those triple digit numbers you're seeing on the Scanner data.

A - Unidentified Speaker

Yes, great. Well, we've got two minutes left. John, I want to just hand it over to you and Toby to wrap things up. The stock has been a home run. Some people would say 8, 9% market share and call it a day. You seem to be much more ambitious than that. So, what's the pitch to investors now for the future?

A - John Fieldly {BIO 17560616 <GO>}

Yes, I think it goes back to what we were talking about. we were talking Robert three years ago at that NACS. I remember standing there and Coke Energy was coming out and, and we were really, we saw a great opportunity because we were just partnering with ABI, many of their independent distributors. And the huge unlock we saw was in, the OTS or small format and also the convenience channel. And that's what really got us excited about moving some of our direct business to this DSD model for this white glove service to gain cold availability and better shelf presence.

And most importantly, keep us in stock. So, we've done that. And then we've moved to Pepsi, put us on a national level field that we're able to compete at a national level, very strategically. And then in addition, this food service opportunity that's opened up where we're seeing the consumption of Celsius outside of traditional energy drinks. I think, we stand here today and Toby and I talk about it.

It's almost, we've changed our tone a little bit going after Energy. We think we have a total beverage play here. especially with consumers, if you go to Gen Z, you're less likely to buy like a fountain drink, especially in the food fast casual arena. On the way Uber Eats and delivery dudes are ordering more, at home deliveries and at work with deliveries. I think there's an opportunity there to capture more share of the overall beverage category and what we're seeing within overall consumption.

So, I think that's a huge opportunity for us. We stand here. Yes, we're at eight shares. So, we and I have a lot higher hopes than that. I think the 22% share in South Florida was a new data point we shared showing that, yes, we can be a 20 share on Amazon or 19 on the latest data, but we also can be that type of share number in a market. And it's one of our key markets as well. We have over 23 key markets right now. And the opportunity is great. Consumers are shifting. They want better for you, more functionality, great flavor profiles, and we have an amazing team.

Just one final question that's brought up from that. And that is, look, this is 200 milligrams of caffeine, which is on par for energy drinks, right? That's energy drink. Would you, are you considering a lower caffeinate, a lower amount of caffeine for, to hit more meal occasions or different occasions? Is that something that's on your radar screen? Or are you going to stick with the more energy drink profile of 200? And there are some, right? There are some energy drinks that are lower, that are 150, they're even 120, and hybrid drinks like 80. So just wondering how you're thinking about caffeination.

Yes, we talk about that a lot. I think there's opportunities there, different pack sizes. We just have a 16-ounce line as well. We see opportunities for that to play. And there could be a lighter caffeinated product down the line. We could also talk about, could be also, there are a variety of different opportunities. I don't want to share some of the things that we're thinking about in our plans, but I think there is a lower caffeinated opportunity down the road for sure.
